MAGAZINE I

Letter from the Editor

Earlier this year, my friend and I signed up to become members of San Francisco Transit Riders. We agreed to meet at their members-only happy hour at Salesforce Tower. As is always the case with this particular friend, I arrived early, and received the familiar “running behind” text. The imposter syndrome kicked in as I weaved in and out of groups of riders and advocates who were all far more educated on public transit than I was. I deemed myself a casual rider, a fan of Muni, but not an advocate.

After a beer and some shared tater tots with the other members, I quickly realized many people shared my same journey. Grew up in a place where there was limited public transit. Moved to the Bay Area. Realized the magic of transit, and could no longer conceptualize living anywhere that transit wasn't a given. That simple realization is what united all of us. I didn't have to be a policy expert. I didn't have to give up my car. I just had to appreciate the role transit played in our cities, in our lives, to be warmly embraced by this community.

Only a few weeks later, I was openly sharing my vision for a print magazine about Muni with a few SFTR members and friends. Imagine, I pitched, a publication that celebrates the lines, the operators, the riders, and the businesses that only thrived when people had the possibility of taking transit. The shared moments we've all experienced on buses and trains, good and bad, that tie us all together. Something tangible we could flip through while we waited for Muni to bring us to work, to shows, and to house parties. Was I remotely qualified to publish a magazine? No. But – importantly – I was craving something that got us off screens and pushed us back into the physical world, and I knew I wasn't alone in that desire.

Since I printed the teaser issue of COMMUNITY, a short version that I raced to put together in time for Transit Month, I somehow managed to fall more in love with Muni, and with the City. I listened as people told me about their favorite routes, some still alive and well and others sadly cut during the pandemic. I saw drawings and photographs and videos of people riding the bus, of the operators they rode with every day, of the classic Muni bus shelters. I paid more attention on my own rides, frequently taking out my headphones to admire the friends who ran into each other on their rides and the strangers who swapped coffee shop recommendations. I embraced transfers as opportunities to try more routes and more lines, pushing myself out of my comfort zone and feeling grateful every time I did.

Only a couple months later, my path forward with this project is as clear as ever. I want this magazine to not only get people on Muni (and excited to take it!), but for it to bring our communities back together, in real life. This city is full of culture, of art, of whimsy, and home to some of the strongest communities I've ever witnessed, but so much of it has been lost. It's time for the pendulum to swing back the other way. I want to take things offline.

On Muni, we open ourselves up to beautiful moments of serendipity. Who knows who we'll meet, who we'll connect with, and who we'll help through our journey on the buses and trains? Let's find out together – and let me tell your Muni stories.

Keep reading and keep riding,

Muni memories and musings from your friends and neighbors

I remember the chaos and magic of taking the 44 on many school field trips. We'd be jammed together, but our excitement couldn't be contained as we were transported to places like Golden Gate Park or Crissy Fields.

– Karen, Outer Sunset

I love the view of Lake Merced on the 29. On a rare clear and sunny day, you can see a mix of stressed students; dedicated bikers and runners; and focused rowers and golfers.

– Steven, Outer Richmond

My favorite Muni line is the 14 and its many variations. It can be a very bumpy ride but it's one of the more dependent bus lines. I never have to wait too long and can usually get a seat after the big stops at 16th and 24th.

He Built the Muni We Know. Now He's Fighting for its Future.

THIS YEAR, AS SAN FRANCISCO TRANSIT RIDERS CELEBRATES 15 YEARS, PETER STRAUS CELEBRATED A MILESTONE BIRTHDAY OF HIS OWN. AND IF THERE WAS EVER A MOMENT TO CELEBRATE ONE OF SAN FRANCISCO TRANSIT RIDERS' FOUNDING FORCES, IT'S NOW. AS A LIFELONG ARCHITECT OF MUNI'S MODERN NETWORK, STRAUS SHAPED THE WAY SAN FRANCISCO MOVES.

When Peter Straus first stepped into the world of San Francisco public transit, he instantly became a part of the current that has carried it from the 1970s to the present day. He has guided restructurings, fought for funding, and sat in the driver's seat both literally and figuratively. If you've ridden Muni at any point in the last forty years, some sliver of your trip has his fingerprint on it.

Straus grew up in New York City, where taking the subway wasn't a choice so much as a given. "I grew up always thinking of public transit as simply the way you got around," he recalls. "Anyone in New York understands that transit can be your main mode of transportation in the City." That simple truth shaped everything that followed. When he arrived in San Francisco, he saw a city on the cusp of developing that same intuitive relationship with its own system. Muni felt alive to him – embedded in the daily lives of San Franciscans. Imperfect but essential.

Before he became a planner, Straus sat in the operator's seat. He chose shifts that let him learn the system route by route, corner by corner. "I wanted to work the extra board so I could see different lines at different times," he says. "You get a broader sense of how the whole system really works." He remembers how quickly the tone of the day could change: "It was hard to go from the very laid-back 22 one day to the constant hustle of the 14 Mission the next." Those early experiences shaped every planning decision he later made. "Schedules aren't just numbers," he says. "You have to understand what a schedule means to an operator."

By 1975, Muni had created a planning position, and Straus dove in headfirst. He helped lead a system-wide restructuring that transformed Muni from a scatter of routes into a coherent network. "We wanted a system that served the whole city, that let you go from anywhere to anywhere with a direct, convenient trip," he explains. The overhaul boosted ridership and, more importantly, reset the philosophy of what Muni could be.

Straus went on to help shape the foundational projects that altered Muni's trajectory: the Market Street subway, the creation of the F-Market, the T-Third, the Central Subway, the Van Ness BRT. His fingerprints run through nearly every major transit project the city has launched in the last half-century.

Ask Straus what the biggest challenge is today, and he returns again and again to funding. "Transit has lived with structural deficits forever," he says. "We could see this coming if we were paying attention." After he retired in 2009, he didn't walk away, but instead he pivoted into advocacy. He helped build San Francisco Transit Riders into a vocal, organized force for change. "After I retired, I realized the real fight was understanding where the money comes from."

Through his many years of planning and advocacy, Straus never lost sight of equity. “A truly equitable system lets you travel from any part of the city to any other on a direct route,” he says. “The systems we envy are the ones everyone rides.” The belief that transit must serve everyone, not just people with no other choice, underpins everything he’s done.

He doesn’t hesitate as he reflects on what gives him hope for the future of Bay Area transit. “People care,” he says. “There are so many people who understand that Muni is essential and ridership is still strong. People have internalized Muni as their way of getting around, maybe more than ever before.” Coming from a man who has weathered every major transit storm since the 1970s, that hope means something.

Ask him about legacy and he laughs, almost embarrassed, and shifts the attention back to the network. “There’s no single project,” he says. “I was lucky to work on so many exciting things — the subway, the T line, the system restructuring. I couldn’t pick just one.” But the truth is clearer from the outside. His legacy is everywhere: in the early-morning operator adjusting a schedule he once shaped; in the kid taking the 29 to school; in the residents that rely on the routes that are now at risk. “Even the routes that seem unimportant on paper matter to the people who ride them,” he says. “That’s what makes a real network.”

What still excites him about transit? Straus grins. “It’s in my genes. I’m interested in it to the point of compulsion.” Thousands of riders are lucky that’s true.

This city moves because people like Straus believed it should. And if the transit community has a north star, it’s him. Still planning. Still pushing. Still riding.

In Review: Transit Month 2025

EVERY SEPTEMBER, THE BAY AREA TURNS ITS ATTENTION TO THE TRAINS, BUSES, FERRIES, AND CABLE CARS THAT KNIT THE REGION TOGETHER. WHAT BEGAN AS SAN FRANCISCO TRANSIT RIDERS' TRANSIT WEEK IN 2016 HAS EVOLVED INTO A FULL-FLEDGED, NINE-COUNTY CELEBRATION OF PUBLIC TRANSIT'S ESSENTIAL ROLE IN THE BAY.

Transit Month isn't just a celebration for transit diehards. Its mission is expansive: boost ridership, re-engage lapsed riders, elevate the transit workforce, and spotlight the economic, environmental, and community value of a thriving regional system. It also serves as a reality check, drawing attention to the fiscal challenges facing agencies and helping even the most casual of riders understand how they can advocate for a better network.

The heart of Transit Month is its events big and small, playful and political. The 2025 program set a new bar for scale and visibility, with more than 80 events across all nine Bay Area counties, nearly triple the initial goal of 30. Riders participated in activities that ranged from massive celebrations like Let's Glow! BART Anime Festival and Viva CalleSJ to more intimate gatherings such as neighborhood walking tours, green building tours, and speculative-fiction panels on the future of mobility.

Bay Area agencies also delivered major ridership milestones, making a measurable impact on ridership habits. Organizers estimate the month generated nearly 24,000 additional transit trips, supported by refreshed branding, popular new graphics from MTC's Craft and Commerce, and a limited-edition batch of 500 collectible Clipper Cards that are sure to become the 'it' accessory of 2026.

Think of Transit Month as a strategic celebration. It strengthens public perception of transit, grows ridership, deepens regional collaboration, and gives thousands of Bay Area residents a way to show up for a robust and reliable public transportation future.

And with successful coordination with the inaugural SoCal and San Diego Transit Months, 2025 marked a turning point: a statewide movement taking shape.

EVENT ATTENDEES

Ride & Seek: A Day by Rail

> START IN: COLE VALLEY

Begin your morning with a cup from Wooden Coffee, where baristas will greet most neighborhood dwellers by name and coffee order. A few doors away, curate a picnic from Say Cheese. From charcuterie to sandwiches to some of the best cheese selections in town, nothing you get will disappoint, especially if you let the staff guide you.

N-JUDAH TO DUBOCE & NOE

As the train climbs out of the Carl Street tunnel, the views open dramatically, with ornate Victorians ready to greet all the riders. One of our favorite reminders that sometimes the beauty of the city is only revealed through motion.

> STOP IN: DUBOCE TRIANGLE & LOWER HAIGHT

Tucked away at the edge of the N, Duboce Park is the perfect spot for a picnic. Enjoy the grassy knolls and the parade of pups begging for your attention. Afterward, walk to Faight Street Collective, where artists often drift in and out, leaving you inspired.

F-MARKET TO GOUGH

With retired fleets hailing anywhere from Brooklyn to Mexico City, this line is a traveling archive of streetcar history. Small plaques inside most cars will tell you its origin story. Transit, with a bit of time travel thrown in.

> HEAD TO: HAYES VALLEY

Spend the early afternoon wandering around Hayes Valley, where you can do some of the finest window shopping. When hunger strikes, grab a slice of pizza, the unofficial fuel of the neighborhood.

22 FILLMORE TO GEARY

This bus line cuts across the city's cultural seams, and will spit you out in Japantown.

> END THE NIGHT: JAPANTOWN

Inside the maze-like Japantown mall, follow the corridors past gift shops and rotating sushi bars until you reach Festa, a warm, unpretentious karaoke lounge. Settle in, pick your anthem(s), and let the end credits roll on your perfect day on Muni.

From Driver to Rider

Q: WE HEARD YOU JUST FIGURED OUT HOW TO GET YOUR FIRST-EVER CLIPPER CARD ON YOUR PHONE. WHAT MADE YOU DECIDE TO START TAKING MUNI?

A: If you're not taking Muni in this city, you're missing out. Or at least that's what my friends kept telling me every time I insisted on calling a Waymo instead of figuring out my nearest bus stop. Turns out the rumors are true. There is perhaps nothing that has made me feel more like a San Franciscan than taking the 5 down Fulton.

– Chaz, new rider of the 5

Q: YOU USED TO DRIVE YOUR CAR INTO DOWNTOWN, EVERY DAY, FOR WORK. WHAT'S YOUR FAVORITE PART ABOUT SWITCHING UP YOUR COMMUTE WITH MUNI?

A: I'd be lying if I didn't say the money I've saved. No more paying for parking, and many, many more happy hours. Plus I know I can get home safely on Muni. I really love taking public transit more than I ever thought I would. I've lived in the city for over 30 years, but I've experienced it in a whole new way since I started commuting on the 30.

Muni Matters

BREAKING DOWN THE BALLOT MEASURES THAT WILL MOVE US IN 2026

— DYLAN FABRIS

But first, why should you care?: Muni, BART, Caltrain, and AC Transit are all facing major budget deficits. If left unaddressed, SFMTA would have to cut 50% of Muni service, reduce fare discounts, stop historic streetcar service, eliminate entire lines, and more. BART would be reduced to one train per hour and forced to close nine stations and two of their five lines. Caltrain would reduce frequency and cut weekend and evening service. AC Transit would have to cut back 37% of its service.

But in November 2026 voters will have a chance to say “NO” to transit cuts and “YES” to Muni improvements. Two critical measures will be on the ballot, and both will need to pass in order to fill Muni’s budget deficit.

PHOTO CREDIT:
ANTHONY SEBBO

LOCAL MEASURE:

WHAT IS IT?

- A regional sales tax to benefit public transit in San Francisco, San Mateo, Santa Clara, Alameda, and Contra Costa counties, that will help fill Muni's deficit, San Francisco will be taxed at a rate of 1% while the other counties will pay 0.5%.

WHY A SALES TAX? WHY THESE RATES?

- The regional sales tax was approved by the state legislature this year following months of negotiations with legislators, city and county officials, advocacy groups, business interests, and more. San Francisco currently pays the lowest total sales tax rate compared to the rest of the counties in the measure, so the rate for San Francisco is larger to help fill more of Muni's budget deficit.

STATE MEASURE:

WHAT IS IT?

- A progressive, variable rate parcel tax based on building square footage so larger buildings pay more. To date, the exact details of the measure are still being worked out, but advocates hope the tax on SF's biggest buildings will be large enough to not only fill Muni's deficit, but to also leave some funding for improvements.

WHY A VARIABLE RATE PARCEL TAX?

- California's Prop 13 (from 1978) restricts the use of taxes based on property value. Instead, many cities use variable rate parcel taxes based on square footage so large buildings like downtown skyscrapers pay their fair share. If passed, this will be the first variable rate parcel tax in San Francisco! Notably, other types of taxes (like a tax on ride-hail companies) would not bring in the amount of revenue needed to fill Muni's deficit.

Ways to get involved:

RIGHT NOW: STAY IN THE LOOP.

If you are a San Francisco resident, sign up for updates from San Francisco Transit Riders at www.SFTransitRiders.org. If you are located outside of San Francisco, look up organizations like Seamless Bay Area and Transbay Coalition, which are mobilizing volunteers to support the regional measure.

RIGHT NOW: EDUCATE FRIENDS, NEIGHBORS, MERCHANTS, AND VOTERS.

It's never too early to start talking about why these measures are important. Talk to your friends and family about why you will be voting to fund transit next year. Talk to your neighbors and local businesses about why transit is important and how service cuts would affect your community. If you work with an organization looking to help, have them join the Muni Now, Muni Forever coalition at MuniForever.org.

NEXT YEAR: HELP GET OUT THE VOTE.

Volunteer to knock on doors and share more info. Depending on how these measures are placed on the ballot, volunteers may also be needed in early 2026 to collect petition signatures from potential voters so the measures can qualify for the ballot. We will need all hands on deck to make sure both measures are successful!

Meet Charles Haletky

TRANSIT SUPERVISOR, SUBWAY OPERATIONS
SPECIAL EXCERPT FROM MUNI IS MY RIDE

Growing up in Palo Alto, Mr. Haletky knew early on that San Francisco was the place he wanted to be.

“I learned to take the bus when I was seven. From that time on, I was independent, didn’t own a car until I was nearly thirty. I like city life. I like seeing neighbors that I know and seeing lots of them. City density gives me access to walk to all sorts of things, and I like the communal aspect of taking public transit, which I think is essential to a healthy community.

I love the randomness, how passengers might be very different socially or economically from you. I love that wealthy people ride Muni, the serendipity of running into friends on the bus, and not worrying about dying. Driving here, I had to avoid hitting a sofa on the freeway. When I’m on the bus, I can be looking at my phone, staring out the window.

And the city is literally built around the transit system. Take Noe Valley. There was a cable car line from the Ferries, out Market, up and over Castro to 26th, and if you go south or west from that intersection, there are Victorians, and two blocks later, 1920s and 1930s bungalows. Those Victorians were the tract housing of the day since that line extended the reach of the city. You can read the city's history in the transit lines. They are such a fundamental part of what the city is.

Everything changes, but Muni is the oldest publicly owned transit system in the United States, and I hope that never changes. The 1912 idea of the city owning and operating a streetcar line was radically socialist. An old nickname for Muni was 'the People's Railway,' and it exists to haul San Franciscans around.

The city couldn't function without Muni and I'm proud to be making my living supporting that. Some say privatizing public transit would save money, but making it cheaper means paying the people who run it less. Profiting from an essential service means not providing better service or more of it. The city runs its transit system for the benefit of the people who live, work, and play here, and that's very important to me."

After Hours

— DYLAN RESNIK

The City had a stillness to it but onboard there was an indescribable sense of life, of worlds colliding. We had stepped on at the Embarcadero, after watching N after N glide by. The Giants had won, the drinks were too strong (maybe just strong enough), and the conversation was too captivating to cut short. By the time we said our goodbyes, it was the N Owl that greeted us.

With each stop, the community grew and the sense of a shared space was magnified.

The two middle-aged men who we sat next to were likely riding to take shelter for a while. It was a chilly night and being on Muni was comforting. Turns out they were following the game from afar and didn't hesitate to swap stories with us. No one batted an eye when the diva boarded in roller blades. Every time the bus lurched forward, they compensated effortlessly, never losing balance and colliding with the nurses who had just finished a late shift at the ER. They weren't fazed.

The teens who hopped on after a concert mostly talked amongst themselves but engaged when appropriate. It was nice to see them deep in conversation instead of staring at a screen.

Driving down Market, then onwards toward the Haight, the ebbs and flows reminded us that there is always life in the City. Our neighbors are restless, they're working, or up with worry, or out to a show, or rollerblading through the dead of night; they may sleep on our corner, they may be known or unknown to us. I've never seen the City in the way I saw it that night, on the N Owl. I saw the beauty and the grit. For once, I met all my neighbors.

A CONVERSATION WITH STEVE PEPPE, SFTR BOARD MEMBER & CO-VICE CHAIR, ON RETHINKING THE CULTURE AROUND MUNI

Q: HOW DID YOU FIRST BECOME INTERESTED IN PUBLIC TRANSIT?

A: Coming from the Midwest, there weren't a lot of transit options, but I was late to the game getting my driver's license so I started relying on one of the few buses in my hometown. Fast forward to moving to San Francisco. It was the perfect city for me, sitting at the intersection of all of my interests – tech, culture, and arts. It didn't take long to realize that Muni and Bart gave me a front row seat to all of it.

Q: AND HOW DID YOU TRANSITION FROM CASUAL RIDER TO ADVOCATE?

A: I met the founder of SFTR, which at the time, was a small and mostly member-led organization. She brought me along for the ride – literally – and we brainstormed all kinds of ways to get more people on transit. We conceptualized a challenge to encourage public officials to take transit. That seemingly small idea took off, leading to Transit Week, which has since evolved to Transit Month. There's a quote from the former mayor of Bogota. Don't quote me on this, but the general idea is that a thriving transit system is one where even the rich take transit. It needs to be a system everyone in the city takes, so we all get out of our bubbles and into our communities. That sentiment has really driven my advocacy.

ALYSSA LOANNOU

Q: AS WE SAW WITH TRANSIT MONTH, THERE IS CLEARLY A MOVEMENT TO GET PEOPLE EXCITED AROUND MUNI, BART, AND OTHER BAY AREA TRANSIT SYSTEMS. BUT WE KNOW WE HAVE WORK TO DO TO TURN THAT EXCITEMENT INTO REAL CHANGE. HOW DO YOU THINK WE GET THERE?

A: There are a lot of things we can do to improve Muni, to try and get more funding, all of that. But the system can't be better unless we change the culture around Muni. We need to get people to understand that Muni is the way to let the city's culture and community seep into you. Think about the energy on a bus after a sporting event, or a show. Everyone is buzzing, and more willing to engage, and you get to see a real beauty in this city that you don't get anywhere else. I know several people call it San Francisco's Living Room, and in those moments, it lives up to the name.

Q: ANY BIG IDEAS ON HOW WE ENHANCE AND CELEBRATE THAT CULTURE ON MUNI MORE?

A: Muni is already starting to do a good job. Bart has done a lot of interesting and fun campaigns too. But we could always be doing more, and this is a critical time to step things up. Imagine if we actually rewarded frequent riders instead of punishing people who can't pay their fare? We could 'gameify' rides, so maybe there's a reward or prize on the other side of 10 or 15 rides. We've applied this kind of innovation in the private sector, but it's time to apply it to our public systems. Some of that is wishful thinking, but there's never been a bigger need for innovation. For now, I'll keep rolling up my sleeves and partnering with SFTR, SFMTA, Muni and its riders to see what we can do together.

So What's Your Line?

THE J: Expect emotional turbulence in the form of a J that shows “23 minutes” for 23 consecutive minutes. You will develop a parasocial relationship with a Muni operator who has no idea you exist but whose voice now guides your moral compass. A stranger in Noe Valley will compliment your shoes in a tone that might be passive-aggressive or might be flirtation. There is no way to know, so pick a lane and lean in.

THE K: Your week is defined by power and delusion. You'll wake up Monday believing you can “just grab a coffee and hop on the K real quick.” The universe will consider this hubris. A man with a guitar will provide unsolicited live music, and you catch your foot tapping to the (off) beat, prompting an identity crisis. Someone will ask you “Is this going inbound or outbound?” and though you don't know, you will lie confidently. This brings good luck.

THE L: The fog has chosen you as its emotional support human. Your phone battery will drop from 58% to 2% the moment you step onto Taraval for reasons that cannot be explained by science. You will witness someone carrying a full, hot bowl of pho onto the L and realize that nothing is real and consequence is an illusion. This week, you are encouraged to manifest abundance by checking the bakery case at Sugar Bowl before deciding how your day is going.

THE M: Chaos surrounds you like the inexplicable small-town energy of West Portal. A child will stare directly into your eyes for three stops and you will be forced to break eye contact by pretending to read a text that isn't there. You will have a revelation on the way to Stonestown that feels profound but turns out to just be "I should buy more socks." Avoid making big decisions, especially if they involve making a tight transfer at Balboa Park.

THE N: This week you will achieve inner peace, but only because you fully disassociate while stuck between Carl & Cole behind a parked Amazon van. A man wearing a Burning Man fleece will deliver a prophecy that sounds suspiciously like an HOA complaint. You will say "I'm just gonna walk" and immediately regret it when a surprise wind tunnel at 9th & Irving slaps you across the face with eucalyptus. Beware of anyone who says "You took the N? Why didn't you just grab a Waymo?"

THE T: You are unstoppable this week, like full-speed T through Mission Bay. Except when you aren't, which is often. A tech bro will sneeze near you and you will genuinely consider switching careers. You will overhear an argument about sourdough starters that alters the trajectory of your worldview. A cosmic message will arrive at the UCSF/Chase Center stop, but you won't hear it because the doors are beeping aggressively. Trust your instincts, especially when they tell you to ride to the end of the line to pop into Delicious Dim Sum.
